Guarded Gates

Neysha from Travelsuras

I lived in Panama when I was young, and over the years I've gone back to visit old friends. One summer I spent three weeks hanging out in the city with my family.

One of the few nights we decided to hit the town, one of my sisters (the only one who still lived in Panama) decided to leave early. No problem, we thought; we could take care of ourselves. Until we found it nearly impossible to find a taxi to take us back to Fort Clayton (the old military base turned residential zone). Once we finally did, the shady guard at the front gate stopped us. He insisted we step out because we didn't have our passports. The driver looked back us, noting that we were two oblivious young girls. After exchanging a few words with the guard, he hit the gas so hard it took our breath away. I'm not sure what the guard would have done if we had gotten out of the taxi, but I can't imagine it would have been anything good. We made it to my friend's house safe and sound, but I'll never take that risk again.
